SAME-SEX MARRIAGES

tion or association must be recognised in the terms of creating the same sense of security, social welfare? By doing that we also ensure that for the future, these relationships will not be ostracised in society," it added. The bench clarified that when it uses the term "recognition", it does not mean "marriage" and that the Centre may think of some other "semantic" like "partners" to identify such unions that make them entitled to certain benefits. "You may not give them a particular recognition of marriage but at the same time there is a need to bring down some barriers," it emphasised.

Asking the SG to come back with a response on May 3 when the case will be heard next, the bench gave examples of certain basic social functions such as joint bank accounts, joint guard-rails and pension benefits and to point out that these are "human issues" of "day-to-day life" which the same-sex couples face due to lack of recognition by the State and its institutions. While the Constitution bench is yet to accept the government's position that the issue of legal recognition of marriage is beyond judicial determination, it opened a completely new dimension to the case on Tuesday proposing a middle path. However, it is still to be seen how the petitioners respond to this course of action before the court.

Urging the SG to take a "non-adversarial stand" on the issue, the bench said: "From that point of view, we would be more than willing to have the government make that statement before us because the government has ministries dedicated to these purposes. This should come from you because ultimately, we want some elements of a broad sense of a coalition. We are also conscious of the fact that so much a representative democracy should achieve in our country."

While Mehta submitted that he would have a consultation with the competent authorities in the government about possible solutions to these "sociological" problems, the top court was categorical that there is no doubt that the Centre can do even without granting legal recognition of marriage to same-sex unions. "Of course, you have made your submissions on the legislative side that this will be in remit of Parliament and state legislature, but there is so many issues on which, on the administrative side, you can find real solutions to so many problems. We cannot see as facilitators to achieve the objective. The relationship of court with the government is not an adversarial relationship. On socio-economic matters, we are constantly pushing the government," it said.

The bench accepted the SG's submissions that the same-sex marriage case has also had impact on personal laws even though it has mandated to confine the remit of these proceedings to recognition of such unions under the Special Marriage Act (SMA), adding the government must also remain mindful of the leap that the law has taken and the 2019 Transgender Persons (Protection of Rights) Act exemplifies the progressive vision of legislature.

"We may not have a model within us, and it may not be appropriate for us to devise that model, but we can certainly tell the government that our law has gone so far now. Within what law it has already recognised, can you face due to lack of recognition by the State and its institutions. While the Constitution bench is yet to accept the government's position that the issue of legal recognition of marriage is beyond judicial determination, it opened a completely new dimension to the case on Tuesday proposing a middle path. However, it is still to be seen how the petitioners respond to this course of action before the court."

Responding that the government's refusal to take a certain stand is still to be seen how the petitioners respond to this course of action before the court. "Urging the SG to take a "non-adversarial stand" on the issue, the bench said: "From that point of view, we would be more than willing to have the government make that statement before us because the government has ministries dedicated to these purposes. This should come from you because ultimately, we want some elements of a broad sense of a coalition. We are also conscious of the fact that so much a representative democracy should achieve in our country."

It's the other way round. It was the morality that British Victorian morality that we had to forsake much of our cultural ethos. You go to some of our finest temples and look at the architecture. You will never say that is lurid. It shows the depth of our culture...very layered and educative. Look at the profound nature of our culture down the ages," it observed.

The bench went on to add: "What happened unfortunately was in 1857 and thereafter, we imposed as if it was a code of British Victorian morality on a completely different culture when our culture was extraordinary inclusive and very broad...which is possibly one of the reasons why our religion never followed foreign invasions...because of the inclusive and profound nature of our culture...Let's not invent canons and queer and trans people as equal citizens. They want to keep us in a secondary status. It's that belief that makes them say that there is no fundamental right to marriage or any relationship like that which goes by any other name!"

Mario D Penha, who is part of a petition challenging the SMA, Citizenship Act, and Foreign Marriage Act, also criticised the government for its stance. Said: "I'm curious to see what exactly the Union will offer on May 3 in terms of possible benefits to queer couples. But our government is refusing to uphold the dignity of marriage to queer people is not unique to India. Across the world, conservative politicians have acted in the same way, first offering domestic partnerships, and civil unions. But the demand for the dignity of marriage never subsides. India should recognise this, and give us our due. Marriage is both a bouquet of rights and an issue of dignity. Any lesser will amount to second-class citizenship," the petitioner said.

DEVE GOWDA INTERVIEW SECTIVE OF HIS CAREER

NEW DELHI: The UK government should investigate extremist activities within the country's Sikh community against the backdrop of pro-Khalistan elements inciting violence and intimidation, an independent review commissioned by British authorities has recommended. The recommendation is part of a landmark review of official engagement with different faiths that was commissioned by former prime minister Boris Johnson in 2019. The report by Colin Bloom, an independent faith engagement advisor, was unveiled by the UK government on Wednesday and suggests how authorities can tackle the activities of religious extremists. A "small, extremely vocal and aggressive minority of British Sikhs who can be described as pro-Khalistan extremists" is promoting an "ethno-nationalist agenda", and some extremists are "known to support and incite violence and intimidation in their ambition to establish an independent state called Khalistan", the report said.

The "subversive, sectarian and inflammatory activities" of such elements don't reflect the true nature of the majority of British Sikhs, and the "extremist fringe ideology within the pro-Khalistan movement" has led to a division within British Sikh communities. In this context, the report said the UK government "should clearly define and investigate extremist activity and identify where this exists within the Sikh community, taking steps to develop a more nuanced and comprehensive understanding of subversive and sectarian Sikh extremist activity."

The findings come at a time when New Delhi has flagged the activities of UK-based pro-Khalistan elements to London, especially after violent protests out of Indian Sikh diaspora in London following a crackdown in Punjab on radical preacher Amritpal Singh and his followers. The Indian side was angered when a prosecutor pulled down the national flag outside the Indian mission last month, and summoned the British deputy high commissioner to lodge a protest.
